The secret to our growth has been our community.

It started with our customer service team of caretakers,who make themselves available 24/7 by text for any questions—even the ones that go way beyond nutrition.

The New York Times

Is Customer Service the New Therapy?

That is often the case with the organic baby food company Little Spoon. The employees on its customer care team are parents themselves, and "we encourage them to relate to and share with our customers," said Lisa Barnett, the company's co-founder. The chat or text conversations frequently shift from "Where's my order?" to "topics they didn't want to ask their friends, families or partners about, but it's a lot easier when you're talking to someone who's anonymous but can relate," she said.

"We had a woman open up about feeling she made

These conversations inspired the launch of our content platform, Is This Normal, which helps our community get answers to raw, honest questions they have about parenthood.

SOME OF OUR COLLABORATORS...

Parents can get all their "wait...is this normal?" questions answered by familiar faces. For every question answered, we pay it forward by donating to each contributor's charity of choice.

We are fueling sustainable, organic growth, delivering 2 million meals across all 48 continental states in under 2 years.

This is driven by our...

- Parenting community and platform, which has emerged as one of the fastest growing communities in our space
- Nimble cold supply chain reaches the entire continental US without any air freight
- Accessible price points, which have enabled Little Spoon to resonate in cities, suburbs and rural areas alike
- Cutting edge product innovation, driven by our community collaboration model for R&D
