In these uncertain times, families need financial security.

Financial hardship is not the result of reckless spending.

It's because people are unprepared for an unforeseen event, like a death in the family.

In spite of this, more and more families are uninsured.

Most with life insurance are still not properly protected.

Why is it that 85% try to buy online, but less than 5% do?

I mean come on, it's 2020. Is there anything people aren't buying online?

Three reasons.

Product confusion

"I'm often confused on how much to get, for how long, and I don't understand the lingo."

Distribution mistrust

"Most insurance companies seem sketchy and I don't think I can trust the agents."

Underwriting complexity

"The whole application process was very long and frustrating. It was daunting."

Existing market participants are not fixing industry issues.

Traditional Carriers

Unwilling to disrupt sales channel

Legacy technology

Risk-adverse culture

↓

Limited innovation

InsureTech Startups

Agents or brokers selling third-party products

↓

New customer experiences, but innovation is limited by dependance on legacy carriers

As a result, the industry is ready for transformation.

Confusing products that don't meet consumer needs.

"Is $500k or $1M enough? How long should my policy last? Term? Whole? Variable? Is my family really protected?"

A fragmented distribution system that isn't trusted.

95% of policies are sold through commissioned brokers, and 89% of people distrust them.

Underwriting that's slow and accurate or fast and risky.

Months to issue a policy. Faster coverage by increasing price and risk.

Low-margin, commodity products.

Term life margins are very thin: 6% or less.
